

such friends again.

The second field which I might consider would be that of teaching in a California High School. The principal advantage here is the financial recompense. I do not know of any other line of work where I could receive as much pay next year as I might hope for in this. The feeling of financial independence would be splendid. It would be good preparation in case I should teach in later life.

Thirdly, I might consider the Bible Institute. This combines with the latter the advantage of another year near home. It would be excellent preparation, whatever field of work I might later enter. I would hope to get a larger knowledge of the Bible and of Christianity. The opportunity of taking time to really study the Bible would be invaluable.

Fourthly, as most recently suggested, Dean Burt and Judge Forbes recommend very strongly that I enter a Broker's office. If I should not devote my life to business, would this be of much value. Of course, as Dean Burt suggests, it might give me an opportunity to find myself, and to see whether I would really care to continue in the business world. He seems to think that it might very probably be my proper place. If not, would a year in a broker's office be of value in some other occupation? Do I desire to devote my life to business? If I should, would it be best to adopt Mier's suggestion, and take a legal training?

I feel too tired and fagged tonight to look at anything in the proper light.
