

years and the heat had been brought from a central heating plant from which they shipped the heat in here. So we had to build a heating plant here. It was the old ~~XXXXXX~~ squash building here - we put in a boiler there. We didn't get it in till in December. All fall our students were carrying kerosene stoves around with them as they came to class. The Lord gave us an unusually warm fall and we got along. We had less sickness than we've had almost any other year that fall. But you know we couldn't tell how the pipes would be through the building until we could get the heat through. And while we understood even in the course of a year you expect to have some repairs

Someone said, "If there are not more than fifty places where you have to repair the pipes and start you'll be very lucky. And you know in December we started the heat and there were only six places so wonderfully, solidly had the place been built.

And God directed the building that they thought was their house but what He knew (5.75). Mr. Widener's grandson wrote a book called "Without Drums" - told of his life here as a boy, and his life in the army in France

And in the book he told how ~~XXXXXX~~ his father one time thought it might be nice to let some people in Philadelphia see the art collection instead of keeping $50,000,000 worth of art treasures just for his family and guests. He put a note in the paper ~~XXX~~ that on a certain day if somebody would like to see the art treasures, they could. Mr. ~~Turner~~ was the butler here, the director of this estate here - he lives right around the corner now retired. Mr. Turner was here and the grandson told him and Turner came upstairs and said, "Mr. Widner, there's a man at the door who would like to see the art treasures. He says his name is Sunday." And so Widener went down and met Sunday and took him showed him the art treasures and then he got out the little book he had secured for guests and the first signature in that book was W. A. Sunday of what this building, the Widener Building, a personal gratification

A place from which the Word of God
