

gesture, accent, emphasis; all these things are vital tools in ~~knowing~~ what getting the thought across. As one sees the faces of those who are listening, and repeats in other words what is necessary to get a thought clearly across, a considerable amount of repetition in speaking thus is entirely natural and necessary; in writing it easily becomes obnoxious. The style is so different that he feels that so far as writing is concerned he could have written much better and with less effort thirty years ago than he can today. However, during these thirty years he has learned a tremendous lot which he feels it is his duty to make available for the next generation. Therefore, now, even at his age, he is working harder than he has ever worked in his life. He is trying to put the results of his study into permanent form. This is hard, exacting work; he would far rather be teaching a heavy schedule; teaching is more enjoyable and has more immediate reward. He feels, however, that the other is his duty, and he is trying to devote every available minute to it.

Dr. MacRae is anxious to take ^{to talk} time/with students, to discuss their problems, to ~~know~~ give every possible help that he can to them. He is anxious though that ordinary routine matters be handled by the Registrar's office. In case of emergency he is always ready at any minute, day or night, to see any student, but if something is not a real emergency he desires now that all interviews with him be made on an appointment basis, sometimes as ~~much~~ much as three or four days ahead. This way he can plan his work, and not be interrupted just when he is struggling with the ~~arrangement~~ ^{handling} of a difficult problem or with the arrangement of the discussion of a matter that he would like to get into clear form for posterity.

It has been one of his greatest joys through the years when individual students have come to him with particular problems, and when he has had opportunity to give offer them the best (that can be derived) ~~from~~ from his experience and knowledge. This year he has rejoiced in giving devoting a* very considerable amount of time to individuals with special problems. He is
