blazing hot down there in that chasm, and he ran on up and as he went up, the walls came nearer and nearer together, and soon he saw that great red wall standing before him. No possibility of getting out this way. He turned and came back and joined Cruikshank, and then they went on down the gorge and soon and they got into a cave there and there they found a little trickle of a stream there in that little gorge. They called it Tuna Gorge because there were no tuna fish there, I suppose, but the next morning they made their way down the gorge and it got steeper and steeper and then they came to a big river and they found this great river winding down there and they said, "Now, here's a river; we'll just follow it up and it will take us out to civilization." So they tried to follow this river, but they didn't know how difficult it would be to follow that river. They went on and where a little creek came into the river there was a little beach and some sand there but then when they had gone about thirty yards they came to a place where the very steep cliff came right to the edge of the river and they climbed up on that fairly steep cliff and they made their way thither and here again and then they'd come to another little beach and then climb up and going on gradually, it took them hours to get even as far as half a mile, and they didn't know it but if they had gone twenty miles that way they would have come to a place where the wall comes absolutely sheer down to the edge of the river and goes that way for ten miles, and if they had gone along the river that way it would have taken them two hundred miles to get to the nearest civilization. Of course they didn't know this, but they kept trying to make their way along beside the river, and then the time came the next day when they became terrifically discouraged and they looked down again at these little beaches just ahead of them and one of them got an idea. He said, "Look, there's pieces of timber there," great long timbers that had come floating down the river and were stranded on that beach. He said, "Let's take these timbers and make a
