down there, that big parachute; we could see it with the naked eye and we put up the radio here and wondered if the one down there had been assembled in such a way that we could talk pretty clearly, and began to talk, and he said, "Walkie-talkie on the phone calling walkie-talkie in the canyon. Walkie-talkie on the phone calling walkie-talkie in the canyon," and he turned it over to me and he said, "Now you talk," and we tried again, and this time he thought of a new idea. After he repeated the phrase twice, "Walkie-talkie on the phone calling walkie-talkie in the canyon," he continued, "if you can hear us, fold up the parachute." He said, "Maybe they can't talk so we can hear but they can hear us," and after he said it we watched and we saw the sides of that parachute begin to fold up -- and then as we looked we saw that it wasn't folding up at all. Everybody was so anxious that it should actually happen that we couldn't help thinking it actually was happening, and it wasn't happening at all. So we tried again and again, "Walkie-talkie on the phone calling walkie-talkie in the canyon. If you hear us, fold up the parachute," and we watched, and this time we didn't see the parachute fold up but we heard a voice come back just as clear as if it was somebody talking right beside us, and it said, "Walkie-talkie in the canyon answering walkie-talkie on the phone. Walkie-talkie in the canyon answering walkie-talkie on the phone," and you can imagine how excited we were. Immediately the officer said, "How many men are there?" "Three men, sir." "Are you badly injured or in good shape?" "We are O. K., sir". "Is there anything you need?" "One pair of G. I. shoes, sir." "What size?" "Eight B". Now, we really

. They needed shoes. Now we wanted to get down there if we possibly could and a plane had flown overhead and had photographed the area and they gave us the picture that was taken and it showed over here a place where there were boulders that seemed to come up beside that red wall, a pile of boulders. One of the aviators said, "As I looked down I could see that you could step right off on top of that red wall right under these boulders and just walk right down the boulders and get right past that section. Well, of course the red wall was
