talked into it and he told them what he thought of the way that pair of shoes was on the walkie-talkie dropped, and they heard that up at the top and they stepped back to a jeep that had a ~~small jeep~~ in it with which they could communicate with the plane and used very different language because it was set and then they dropped another pair of shoes. They were nine B instead of 9 d but he cut holes on the two sides and was able to get his foot into them, and we made our way back up that gorge and down through the little recess to the red wall, and we climbed up through that recess and we got up to the top of it and we camped there for the night and the next morning we made our way on from up there through the mountains and we got to the top and there were the canteens of water, blazing hot but beside them there was a dozen oranges the sergeant had brought and then we started back from there through the woods and when we got about half a mile we heard voices. We holloded and they holloded and and we came together and and there they were with some of their families, and some of their friends and then the National Park officials and and then my wife came to and the radio people and the newsreel people and the reporters, and the boys had to do all the talking and they then they took us out and gave the boys the first meal they had had at a table in ten days and the ranger and I the first hot meal we had had in two days and we all did full justice to it, and they took movies all around all the time we were eating and then after they finished that they took the boys out to the end of Point Sublime and they showed them where they had been, and the boys stood there at the end of Point Sublime and they looked down and way down below them there they could see the place where they had been. How different it looked! They said, "Is it possible that down there those great big mountains which look like little knolls from up here. Down there you could look way off in the distance and it looked like a little bit of a hill way off, and and up here it looked utterly different. You couldn't imagine how different it would look.
