

~~readily~~, particularly readily. Particularly it is my memory for recent things that had deteriorated from the high point that it seemed to possess before. One thing that puzzled me, even ~~in~~ in high school and college: in high school and in college I had classes in various rooms of a two-building in two different buildings. I would During a semester I would go to certain rooms on certain days for certain classes. Some would be twice a week; ~~some~~ some three times a week, etc. Within two days after the semester started it was simply habitual with me. At the particular hour on the particular day to go to the particular room. I never even had to stop and think or look at any notes about ~~it~~ it after the second day. But when the new semester came, within two days I had the new schedule completely in my mind, ~~and~~ and probably had completely forgotten the previous schedule.

I have always had a desire to be friendly with anyone who was willing to be friendly with me, and even if a person had treated me in a mean way, if he wanted to be friends it would be very simple for me to forget whatever he had done in the past toward me. I always get great pleasure ~~in~~ out of hearing the latest news about anyone whom I have known, even most casually. I Sometimes I have thought this is my historic bent of mind, because, greatly interested as I am in any news about any one, I don't have any special desire simply to see them, him, say, "How are you? how are you getting on? how is everything? it's a nice day, isn't it?" People I am greatly interested in may visit the seminary and I have no desire to see them personally, ~~and~~ and shake hands with them, but I have tremendous interest in knowing any news about them. It is I think as a person grows up one tends to think everybody is more or less like himself, and it is interesting to observe what great differences there are, and to observe one's own peculiarities, one's own points of strength which one is often asked (?) apt(?) not to realize and not to develop as he should, and his points of weakness at which he is apt to have false ideas of his ability.