those who see that someone else has a far greater reward than they have will simply know that there must be, they must have deserved better than I or they wouldn't have gotten it, and the one who sees that someone has a less torment than he has will say, "Well, he must have been better than I, even though all my life I thought he was worse, or it wouldn't have come that way." That is, I was wondering if the purpose of the judgment wasn't to make manifest to each one not merely his own desert but his comparative desert, that he would not be able to say, "Well, now this fellow has it better than I have and he was worse than I am on earth," he would see what the other fellow had done and what he had done and every mouth would be stopped before God because everyone would see that God was not only righteous with them but that He was righteous with everybody else and that on a comparative basis he had been treated
