

so many other events that are contrary to the usual course of nature in the chapter that there is no particular reason for the parting from the traditional interpretation, that it is the ravens that brought him the food every morning and every evening.