

it we saw right near the back end of the pond three very lovely swans which were swimming there in the pond and as you looked at it it was indeed a beautiful world, everything was lovely, that pretty pond and those beautiful swans swimming around and the trees behind and the other side of the pond quite a distance away nothing else in the pond but the swans, but as we looked we saw a duck clear at the other end of the pond come waddling across the ground towards the pond and jumped into the pond, oh, a hundred yards away, and the swans heard the sound of the ducks getting into the pond and one of them turned and started across that place just as fast as it could go across the pond and came to the other end and jumped at the duck and began to fight it in the neck and drove the duck out of the pond. They weren't going to have any ducks in their pond. (laughter) but the thing that impressed me was to see this girl from the Social Service rise up and she said, what, that pond is social. (laughter) and she seemed to think that you could make a human being social simply by telling them what to do and even with the swan there is something in the world that has affected the animal creation (end of record c 13 and a world of disappointment. It is most interesting to read how St. Augustine went to that little church at in North Africa and began working there among those people and how he presented the gospel there to those people and how he got more and more influence throughout North Africa and eventually was the leading force in meetings at Carthage and his opinions were listened to all over the civilized world and his influence, of course is great even to this day, but to me one of the saddest pictures I have ever heard is the story of how a man who seemed to Augustine to be a true Christian, for Augustine had had quite a bit of correspondence with him. When this man was leader under the Roman government of North Africa, he came into disagreement with the Romans over some matters and in order to get help he went to the vandals in Spain who were temporarily staying in Spain and he said to them, will you come and bring me some help against the Romans and they were very glad to do it and so the vandals
