then at the last minute they rush around like mad trying to make up for time that has been lost, that has been wasted, that has gone forever. The parable of the talents, I think, brings this out among other things. You remember the man, when he went away, gave different amounts of talents to different people. They had different abilities; they had different material, and when he came back, you remember, away and let the time go by. There was nothing he could do about it now. It was gone, and the Lord said, "Let him be cast out into outer darkness." People have the idea that the game of chess is a game which is only using ability, in which there is no chance. I don't think that is right at all. I think there is a lot of chance in a game of chess, but I think that the chance comes in in the moves you make in the early part of the game of which you don't realize what they are going to lead to later on. They may lead you very well or they may lead you very poorly, but to my mind one of the outstanding features about that game of chess is this. During the early part of the game you can move this man, you can move that man, you can move the other man, you have your choice which, and it doesn't seem to make much difference but pretty soon you get in a crisis and if you just had an extra move you'd win that game. If you could just move these two men, this one here^{to here}/and this one here to here, you'd have the game. Why, you could have done that well, you had lots of time to do it and you didn't do it, and now your time is gone, it is over. Now you are defeated in the game simply because you didn't utilize the time that you had, simply because when you didn't have the pressure upon you, you didn't set to work to use the time properly. I think that that is a lesson which, if we could learn, it would be as important as almost anything we could get in Seminary. I remember Dr. Buswell speaking once at a time when he went with Martin Walsh on a trip and observed the way in which Martin Walsh made every little minute count for a chance to give out the word
