

.....when he brought this out and she saw it, he said, Your illness had a purpose, and avoided for you the temptation which you yourself are not brave enough~~x~~ to face. And she looked at him with astonishment, and he said, Do you mean if I could fa~~x~~ce what horifies me, I could walk again. Try, said Freud. You have only to forgive yourself of what you have thought. You have only to consider the temptation you have reasonably and logically. Try and do not be afraid. The sick girl sat with her eyes closed as if she were about to faint, and then slowly she stood up and took her f^rst step, ~~C~~rying, I can, I can. And a few months later he saw her in perfect health, just about to be married, not to the former ~~xxxx~~ brother-in-law, but to another man, and that thing passed entirely away, but entirely happy and entirey over this. ~~Am~~

And Freud went on from those three cases to fill his theory. And he worked with Brewer for a time, but soon Brewer became horrified at the fact that ~~xxxx~~ Freud was getting into the theory that in back of every ailment there was some sex problem. And Brewer said, That's nonsense. And Freud said, Yes, ~~xxxx~~ but look at this governess, she wanted to marry her employer. Look at this other girl. She wanted to marry he brother-in-law. Sex is in~~x~~ back of it. Well, Brewer said, Yes, but in my case, there was no sex in that whatever. Yes, Freud said, ~~Once~~^{of} the various symptoms there, she heard the sound of some young people on the street and she wished she was with them, instead of her father. And that was one of the cases. You can see there was sex in that too. And Brewer was so disgusted with him, that ~~when~~ they wrote the account of it, they told ~~xxxx~~ together about the case, and then each of them gave his explanation separately. And Brewer was so disgusted with Freudsⁿ attitude, he wouldn't ~~xxx~~ even speak to him after that, and so they didn't work together any more. And Brewer went on in his other line.

But Freud did a wonderful thing in finding the fact which the Bible told us long ago, that the heart of man is deceitful and desperately wicked, and that experiences we have and try to crowd out, and shocks
