Men are constantly attempting to make predictions about the future. Time after time each of us finds his decisions in daily life affected by his idea of the future. How we wish we could tell exactly what is going to happen. The man who plants a crop would like to know whether the weather will bring him a poor crop or a bumper crop. When his crop is ready, he is interested in predicting the flux of prices to know whether to sell at once or to hold for a higher price. The man who buys a house would like to know how the community is going to develop around him, and how soon it may be that his business will require him to move to another part of the country. We constantly read predictions of the number of new school buildings needed to house the children that will soon be in attendance. Everyone of us wonders what will be the state of the world ten years from now.

But all of us constantly discover that it is very difficult to make
