Then there's another part of the curriculum that tended at Princeton Seminary to be minimized, and that is what we call the ^{method} practical side, and that we do not intend to minimize here, because we feel it is of tremendous importance. I have had the painful experience of sitting in a church, in the sixth row back of the church, where there are at least 20 rows, and seeing the minister up in front preaching, and I would have to strain my ears to hear him. And when I strained real hard, I found he was giving good solid interesting material and the people in the tenth, I don't think they heard more than one word in four. There's nothing wrong with a man's voice (11)

We believe it is most important to learn the methods, there's no point in saying nothing and getting it across, but there is little point in saying some wonderful things and not getting them across. People say oh, if I didn't have to take pastoral theology
