

positively "weird". This gives something of an idea of the present usual attitude today toward the application of such methods in the field of ~~general~~ general literature.

I would like to arrange our study of this matter under four heads, speaking first of three tendencies of the last century which became very widespread for a time, but which have now in the main subsided or disappeared. And then speaking of a fourth tendency which has application more particularly to the study of