(3 3/4) ... ^{the question of the relationship of} sometimes, what we learn from God's Word to the material that we learn from other sources of information is considered to be a difficult and complex question.

Actually, however, it is quite simple. The Bible is the Word of God, the world is the creation of God, God cannot lie, His creation and His Word cannot possibly disagree. However, interpretation ~~is~~ of the creation that He has made is often very difficult, Men can easily make mistakes. The interpretation of the Word sometimes involves complexities. Men can jump to unwarranted conclusions. Thus interpreters of the Word and interpreters of the world can disagree, but scientists and Bible scholars can disagree, but science, true science and true Bible, and the true meaning of the Bible are bound to be in harmony since God is the author of both.

The Bible believer never has reason to be limited in any way in his freedom of research. All the universe that God has set before us is here for, is put in our hands, and it is his will that ~~we~~ we should investigate it in every way that we can. We are supposed to do it, and to bring it, to put it to use. It is God's will that we use the brains He has given us. Observation, induction, deduction, reflection, all of these are part of His purpose for our life here. Everything that we learn from them is to be treasured. However, we in this ~~free~~ field, as in all others, there is the possibility of making ~~many~~ mistakes.

The greater part of what we learn from the Bible, while being just as definitely scientific and reasonable as anything we learn by our observation or deduction deals with data ~~which~~ we could not possibly reach, except if God's Word did not make them available to us. When the Bible, where the Bible deals with materials that do relate to that which we can observe, we then have the duty of seeing how our observation and the Biblical statements fit together. We must not jump to conclusions from Biblical state-
