account of that situation and the Belgians said, "There is no safety for us in this situation. We're just going to stay neutral," and both of them refused to allow the British and French to have any of their resources. They were going to stay out of it, and stay neutral, so when finally Hitler decided to attack Holland and Belgium he had an open road through them right into France and the British who marched up into Belgium after the Germans had invaded it were in a position where there was no time to set up any decent defense lines or anything and were just driven out and driven back to Dunkirk. The Belgians and the Dutch were trying to be neutral, and they lost out completely through it. Now if they had seen the nature of the menace and had thrown themselves along in with England and France they might not be any better off than they are now but they certainly wouldn't be any worse off and they would certainly have much more reason to ask England to help them now than they have under the present situation. Well, now perhaps there is an analogy there to some extent to the situation at Moab. They say, "Moab is going to have its downfall anyway, we might as well fall together. Let her join in with us and help us and if we do it will be remembered when there is a throne established and One sits thereon in truth in the tent of David, judging and seeking justice and swift to do righteousness. The eventual power is guaranteed for Zion. Therefore let Moab now join with Zion. I think there is a very good analogy here to the situation of the person in the world today. You build up a great work for God today and you have no guarantee whatever that within the next fifty years one of two things won't happen. In France the followers of Calvin built up a tremendous work with millions of people turning to the Lord and the whole thing was swept over by Romanism eventually and the people were either killed or driven into exile and protestantism was wiped out in the land and the work just failed completely, eventually; in the meantime there were many souls led to the Lord. On the other hand, there were other
