

Yes, you mean after Phocus? Yes, well the church of Africa, had refused, of course, to recognize the authority of Rome until the Van 's conquered it and then the church of Africa was in such a pitiable condition that they were glad that they could be of any help they could and under those circumstances, while they were under the Van the Pope wrote them and gave them help but he declared his supreme powere ~~of~~ over them and they did not make any objection to it, and if you don't make any objection to a thing like that it soon becomes established. Well, then, of course, in the 6th century, Justinian's forces captured Africa and when they conquered Africa, there would naturally be a tendency for the Bishop of Constantinople to extend control over Africa and yet Africa was so much nearer Rome that when he conquered Rome also, it would seem more logical for them still to be in the Roman section rather than in the Eastern section and just what arrangement was made of that or whether there was one that was constant, I don't know. There may be definite evidence on it, but it is not particularly important because it would be very logical for them to be under Rome anyway. The arrangement was that the churches in the area of Constantinople were under Constantinople, and those in the area of Rome were under Rome, but the claim of the Bishop of Rome was that he was over everything, also Constantinople, and, of course, Africa wouldn't prove anything really right or left in that regard. (question) 2 Oh, I don't think that would be difficult to prove. There is no (discussion) tell how he rejoiced when he became emperor and how splendid it was and what good things they looked forward to under his leadership, and so on (discussion) Well, I think they were both under these, and he got the praise he wanted from Phocus (question 3) Not right off-hand. I never heard so I haven't looked to try to find out the but I have little doubt that you could find (Mr. Fowler question) In 's book you will find it. Well, I don't think it is necessary to take time in that light. Now, you can read the question and if you would like to ~~bring~~ go into it, I would like to help you find the material on it, but of the thousands of that come up, we
