

D. Roosevelt. He couldn't tell the truth. And then there was Harry Truman. He couldn't tell the difference (laughter). Well, that doesn't mean that's all the President's we've had. You simply pick three because logically they go along in a certain sequence. Somebody else would pick a different three. He'd say, Truman isn't in that category, at all. He might even say F.D. wasn't in that category. He could say, we have George Washington, the great President who won the Revolutionary War. Then we could say, we had Abraham Lincoln, who in the day of great crisis, kept the nation unified, and then he could say, We have Eisenhower, and tell you what he did. That is, who he would pick, I don't know, but the pick could be made different ways. But it wouldn't mean that there were no presidents in between. Unless you said definitely you are going to name them all, you have no right to assume they are all named. It depends on your purpose. If you are going to name all the presidents, then, of course, you have got to name them all. But, you are not naming them all unless you specifically say that is what you are going to do. If you are giving a general summary you pick the ones who for some special reason are of importance. You can't tell all of everything. It is impossible. And if your purpose is to name all the Presidents, that's what you should do. But if your purpose is to give an idea of the future, you pick those matters that are of importance. You might not even pick Presidents. You might pick certain Presidents, and then certain other leaders, in other directions. Well, now, in this case, I think that is a very important thing to remember, that you have no right to assume the two statements follow each other with no break between, unless it is specifically so stated, or there is something in the context which makes it quite evident that that was the case, which leaves no doubt about it. Somebody comes in here, and he says to me, I say, Where have you gone to school? Oh, he says, I graduated from the U. of Arkansas, and he says, I went to Podunk Theological Seminary, and I graduated there and I took some graduate work in such and such a seminary. Well, that's interesting. When did you graduate from college? Oh, I graduated from college in 1932. When did you graduate from Seminary? I graduated from Seminary in 1945. Well, I say, what did you do in between? And then I find out something about a career he had in some other
