

11/27/62, No. 10 Cont'd

raises the possibility that where you have the three "hearkens", three verses starting with "heark", and then three verses starting with "awake, awake, put on strength, O the arm of the Lord or something like that, that each of these six different sentences is the beginning of ~~the~~^a section   and we would have to, you cannot assume it from that, you have to examine, but it won't take much examination to prove that it is^a correct suggestion/in this case(?) Here is an obvious type of division. Now, in one sense we can understand. Mr. Mackey. _____ is entirely right/ all through the chapter, because all through the chapter you have a series of such introductions. But you do not have any place that is repeated all through the chapter. You have one that is repeated through the first part ~~and the~~ and the one last part. What does that suggest about the main division of the chapter. Yes, it suggests that after verse eight between verse one and eight we have three sections, each introduced with the same phrase. And after verse eight we have three sections each introduced with ~~the~~ different themes ~~different~~^{one} that is from that/before. Now whether this ~~will~~^{the} makes one long section/divided into two parts, first with three, and the next verse with three, or whether they are two distinct sections, that is a question for which you have to examine the context, and make your decision. But ~~the~~ at least there is a division whether it will be a major division or minor division. Here in verse nine. Do not reach a conclusion like that simply noting the repetition of the phrase. But the repetition of a phrase, when it occurs three times like that, and it is obviously parallel ~~the~~^{clue to the} suggest an examination to find out whether it is an obvious/division, and if it certainly works out that way. Your first part.

No. 11

51:

(13.50)

_____ here, verse eight, _____ look at verse one, Hearken to me, ye that follow after righteousness, ye that seek the Lord; verse four, Hearken unto me, my people; and give ear unto my, O my nation....