

man who stood squarely for the Nicene view. He firmly believed in the whole deity of the Lord Jesus Christ. He was a man whom I have mentioned to you previously who when Julian gave the order "Christians may not use the classics because the Christians don't believe in Mercury and Jupiter so how can they teach these works, they can't get the significance of it if they don't believe it, so they mustn't teach them." That of course put out the Christian professors in the schools all over the empire and Apollinarias said "let's write some Christian classics." So he and his son set to work to write Christian classics to stand beside Homer and the other great classics of antiquity. But while some people said they were better than the regular classical works, nobody really believed it. There are great Christian works but
