But the fact that this man used those words ~~came to be~~ in later years sort of an unconscious proverb and he enjoyed telling it.

question - When Julius Caesar was in Rome there was a man called the Preacher who you might say was the mayor of the city of Rome. That was Brutus. Julius Caesar was ruling practically the whole Roman Empire although he wasn't called to it.  $4\frac{1}{2}$  But he had appointed Brutus as preacher of Rome and the ----- was really like the mayor except he had more power. He was a governor; that didn't mean he had arbitrary power but he had the authority and duty to maintain law and order, maintenance of the public works, sewers and water etc. to see that the administration of the city and city problems rather than national and international problems were handled. I think you have that in nearly all countries except the United States. Here the District of Columbia is ruled by a committee of Congress. The local people have no voice and it is a very poor sort of system. There is some discussion about making a change because these congressmen are not elected to run a local area, they were elected with other things in mind but in order to keep the independence of Washington, that sort of government was set up when the district was established. It has proven very unsatisfactory and there is talk of some change, but it is hard to think of a better system because you don't have there a city like ~~NY~~ NY which has ~~the~~ local things intirely separate from national. So we have a problem that hardly any other country has. In Milan of course was the center of the empire but the city was great on its own.

The first was the administration of the Christian church in Milan and the area immediately around it; preaching, dealing with inquirers, handling all the different affairs of the church there. Then he gave a certain amount of attention to the church throughout the empire and felt it his duty to take an interest in the church as a whole and he wrote letters and took an active part, although in his particular case, things did not work out but he did a great deal immediately in relation to things in the area. He was one of the great figures of church history though not one who
