ruler arose in this little land of Sinim who led his armies out and conquered the whole of China and for a brief period had the whole land of China in subjection and he was able to establish relationship with foreign lands to some extent and they his empire and our modern name of China is derived from the name of this small section of China which was the first section from which China was unified, even though that particular unification of China lasted a comparatively short time. Now it is very interesting that it should so happen that ^{are} we/dealing with this passage right now; these facts about China I got from a Professor of Chinese studies in the University of Pennsylvania some years ago, but it is rather interesting when we are just discussing this now that last Friday or Saturday I happened to pick up in the public library the new book by Toynbee, the noted English historian, in which he tells his thought for the future of the human race and thinks it likely than in a few years only the pigmies and of central Africa will be living and that all the rest will be killed off from the atomic bomb, etc. , and from them will come the new race that will fill up the new earth in the course of the next fifteen or twenty thousand years. Time magazine has got a review of the book in its last issue in which it has half-page picture of these of central Africa to show what the population of the world is apt to look like ten thousand years from now. Now, as I glanced through that book of Toynbee's he discussed in it at one place the race unification of the greater part of Europe by the Roman empire and of China by these rulers from Sin and he put these two together in one of the essays that form that new book which he has just published. That was a rather interesting, recent evidence of the fact that my understanding from Professor in University of Pennsylvania a few years ago agrees with the understanding of this phase of Chinese history which Professor Toynbee holds in . Well now this, then, makes it very interesting that Isaiah should have used in advance a name which might naturally have been used for China in his day and then that that name would come to remain universally used outside of China for China to this day and a
